Hoardings glorifying Mathur come up during CMs visit

Barmer : A number of hoardings obliquely suggesting BJP national vice-president Om Mathur may take over the state's reins after the Bihar polls came up at important crossings in Barmer on Sunday – the last day of chief minister Vasundhara Rajee's three-day visit to the district.

The initiative will also regulate tourism by providing a better experience to tourists.

Sensing potential embarrassment for the BJP leadership, Mathur immediately issued a statement and blamed "miscreants" for trying to damage his and his party's image. In the hoardings Mathur featured along with Prime Minister Narendra Modi and with the message that he would take Rajasthan on the path of prosperity.

Mathur, a Rajya Sabha MP from the state, shares cold vibes with Rajee, and it is not the first time that the talk of him replacing the chief minister is doing the round. Earlier, when Rajee was embroiled in the controversy over her ties with former IPL commissioner Lalit Modi, there was speculation that Mathur could be made the CM.

However, after the news about the hoardings was highlighted in the media, Mathur tried to distance himself from the controversy. Condemning the incident, he said it was not the act of any partyman or his followers. "It seems that some miscreants have done this to damage my and my party's image," he said, adding that using the prime minister's image like this was criminal.

The BJP leader said that for the last 10 days, he had been celebrating the Navratri festival at his native village and he had no contact with anybody from outside during this period. However, some supporters of Mathur in Barmer claimed that they had installed the hoardings.

Sabal Singh Bhati, who claimed to be a BJP worker and Mathur's supporter, said that during the Lok Sabha election he and many others like him had worked for the party to ensure its victory but due to personal conflicts between Rajee and expelled leader Jaswant Singh, the state's development has been hit.

TIFR team comes up with potential Malaria Vaccine

Udaipur : The team of scientists from Tata Institute of Fundamental Research (TIFR), Mumbai have identified a group of proteins present on the malaria-spreading plasmodium parasite, and combined their finding with cutting edge genetic and nanoparticle research to produce antibodies in mice to ward off a malaria infection. The work is however, in early laboratory stage and may take years to reach human trials.

Udaipur's Dr. Gotam Jarori whose work was published in Malaria Journal says, "The need for a vaccine to control malaria has become important because of emerging resistance to existing anti-malarial pills. There are over 30 malaria vaccine candidates across the world, with the first-ever vaccine set to start field trials in Africa."

"But our candidate-vaccine seems to have the broadest use as it could be effective against all strains of malaria," he said. The African trial vaccine, for instance, is known to offer more protection against cerebral malaria.

The TIFR team found a five-amino-acid segment that is of prime importance to the malarial parasite. "Each of the parasite's cells uses this protein to break down glucose into energy," said Dr Jarori. His team has proven that this protein is important in spreading malarial cells to the host's red blood cells as well as within the vector mosquito's stomach.

"Blocking this protein would thus control the disease's spread in humans as well as break the transmission cycle among mosquitoes," he said.

The work was carried out in collaboration with the University of Maryland School of Medicine, Baltimore, whose scientists have special nanoparticles that were genetically fused with the protein segment. This was the vaccine-candidate that was then injected into mice. "We found that even a lethal strain of mouse malaria parasite in these vaccinated animals showed considerable protection against malaria," said Dr Jarori.

Dr Jarori said that the work was still in early stages. "It takes long to translate laboratory work into field work. This is just a drop in a bucket, but we believe we have developed the best mechanism to vaccinate against malaria. If it works in subsequent research, it will not only protect people against all strains of malaria, but ensure that mosquitoes won't be able to carry parasites from one person to another," he added.
