

Move on!

What I have observed with so many people is that they get disturbed easily. It takes a small comment or remark that leaves people in unrest. The person who gave you the unrest moves on and so should you but you don't. And that's the reason we remain unhappy most of the times.

Why should I move on when the matter hasn't settled yet? is the question your brain would pop as soon as you try and appease yourself. But then you should seek inspiration. And to look for the inspiration, you do not need to look outside or inside. All you need to realize is that the clock is ticking.

Editorial

The time has moved on. An instance happened in office took place at 11:35 a.m. today and its already 4:29 p.m. You will get your answer easily. You will know what paradigm the God has designed the world with. It keeps on moving. Things are bound to happen so they do. And time is bound to move on after the instance is over, so should you.

But its not just that you move on without any takeaway. With any instance you get a lesson to learn. So pickup the lesson and dump all the silly words, stupid gestures, and fake attitudes. Simply throw all the packaging outside the window of your moving Time Car. Pickup the food it had. Eat well and move on!

Have We Failed To Develop Our Children As 'SAFETY GENTLEMEN'?

It was a proud and a delightful moment for the father sitting as a pillion rider, while his 12-year old son drove the scooter. Suddenly, a car came out of nowhere. Not knowing what to do, the boy turned the handle in the other direction and the scooter crashed. The boy's father lost his life...

Whose fault was it? Do we have a reply?

The father was happy that he was making his child independent at such a small age. On the other hand, aspiring to be like his father, the boy did not know the consequences of driving at such a tender age. Can the child really pardon himself for the loss of his father? Or should he?

We as a society have failed to develop our children as 'Safety Gentlemen'.

Today, parents with great pride & confidence, allow their young children to drive a vehicle. Parents think it will make their child self-reliant.

But will it really? Are these children even capable of making life decisions at such a young age? There is a reason why the government has permitted the legal age of driving a non-geared two-wheeler only at 16, whereas, a geared two-wheeler and a four-wheeler still needs you to be 18. Are we smarter than the system? Parents tend to take the system for granted and then blame the system again for the chaos. They don't realize that they themselves are responsible for bringing indiscipline on the roads and putting their child's life at risk. Parents ought to understand that maturity can't have double standards. Safety is an attitude and its first teaching starts at home. 'Safety' should be made obligatory in the school curriculum from the primary classes itself. Schools should provide professional training to teachers who can impart quality road safety education to the students.

This is how we can develop a generation of 'Safety Gentlemen'.

Today, the condition of the nation is horrifying with 16 children killed in road accidents every day. When our children are taught about road safety, they will bring about the change in the system and mind-sets.

These 'Safety Gentlemen' will give rise to a safer generation, who will perhaps someday, make India the first accident-free country in the world.

The visions are drawn long term – But we also need to build a ROADMAP.

Be Safe Zindagi in an initiative by Hindustan Zinc to achieve the mission of making Rajasthan an accident free state.
